THE GAZETTE.

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 16.

THE PLAYING.—One lady of rank, at whose house he was spending the evening, committed the extreme indiscretion of asking him to play, a violation of all rules of etiquette among great musical artists. He had been entertaining her guests with his divine music in the earlier part of the evening, and had just come to from supper when she preferred her request. "Madame, j'ai mangé trop peu," was his answer. (Madame, I have eaten very little,) and with this implication of having played out the worth of his supper, he left the house. His contradictory elements only prove him to be what he is at the piano—half demon, half angel. If his mood happens to be a gloomy one, his fingers fly about as if he had a demoniac imp at the end of each one. His playing becomes almost infernal in its wild passionate power, and he looks furiously at his audience with a malicious expression of delight and triumph, watching the effect he produces. This is his demon side. At other times he will play with the deepest pathos, touching the keys so caressingly, so tenderly, so weepingly, that I've seen men listen with the tears running down their cheeks. And yet, when he rises from the piano not a sound is heard. He is too great to be applauded. He does not need it. He merely walks quietly away from the instrument, waiting until some one recovers breath or self-possession enough to speak, and then he takes the first break in the silence will be a long deep drawn sigh, and "How grand!" spoken in an undertone of awe.—Scribner for October.
